Based on histological and histochemical studies of the thymic epithelium (TE) of the human thymus in 61 sections obtained by serial thymectomy, it was demonstrated that the thymic cortex contains numerous lymphoid nodules with antigen-presenting cells and lymphocytes. During various periods of ontogeny, the lymphoid nodules underwent profound alterations in the structure of the epithelium of the TE. In the early and intermediate periods of development, the TE contained antigen-presenting cells in the form of reticular cells and/or macrophages with phagocytosing activity. A considerable number of lymphocytes was revealed in the thymic cortex by T and B lymphocytes as well as in the thymic medulla. In the postnatal period of the development of the thymus, antigen-presenting cells and lymphocytes of various maturity levels were observed. The most mature thymocytes were contained in the perivascular lymphoid nodules, which also contained the remaining morphological types of thymocytes. In the thymic medulla, the lymphoid nodules showed mixed and polyclonal lymph
