Cholesterol oxides in humans: effect of dietary cholesterol on the plasma lecithin:cholesterol acyltransferase activity and the kinetic parameters of cholesterol elimination from the plasma. The activities of three important enzymes in plasma sterol metabolism, the lecithin:cholesterol acyltransferase (LCAT), cholesterol 7 alpha-hydroxylase (C7H) and cholesterol-24 hydroxylase (CH-24H), were determined in 10 healthy volunteers after fasting and following dietary cholesterol for 4 days. The LCAT activity was significantly increased after a cholesterol-rich diet. When the data were analyzed as a fraction of total activity it was found that the increase in LCAT activity was primarily due to the increase in enzyme activity towards low density lipoprotein (LDL) and not to high density lipoprotein (HDL). The free cholesterol-esterification rate with HDL-cholesterol was the same after a cholesterol-rich and a control diet. The increase in enzyme activity towards LDL was approximately linear with the total lipoprotein-cholesterol. The C7H activity was not altered by the dietary cholesterol, while the CH-24H activity decreased by 30% (p less than 0.05). The fractional rate constant for cholesterol elimination from plasma was decreased by dietary cholesterol, (from 0.027 to 0.019 min⁻¹). This decrease can be explained on the basis of both a decrease in the volume of distribution of plasma cholesterol (from 0.50 to 0.35 l) and an increase in the rate of diffusion from plasma to body fluid (from 0.13 to 0.17 min⁻¹). These results suggest that plasma cholesterol oxides are only a minor fraction of the total amount of cholesterol in plasma. Simultaneous quantitative analysis of fungicides in grapes, wine, and winemaking wastewater by reversed-phase liquid chromatography with ultraviolet detection. An analytical method based on an aqueous extraction followed by liquid chromatography with ultraviolet detection (HPLC-UV) has been developed for the simultaneous determination of acetamiprid, azoxystrobin, cyflufenamid, fluopyram, flutriafol, propaquizafop, pyraclostrobin, tebuconazole, and triadimenol in grapes, wine, and winemaking wastewater. The use of a diode array detector was instrumental in enhancing the signal of fungicides from an extensive spectral range of UV. The optimized

Q: Why do some AC power cords have connectors in a cluster, and some don't? I'm trying to figure out why some power cords for USB devices have a cluster of connectors but some other cords don't. All of the "cluster" cords I've come across only use a single male power connector. I've also seen some cords that have a cluster of male plugs. I've seen a few cords that have male plugs that connect the 3 prongs, and others that have a cluster of prongs or another cluster of prongs. Why do some cords not contain a cluster of connectors, and why do some cords contain a cluster? Is one a convenience feature and the other is a necessity? Is it a standard? Did someone just get the idea that one way works better than the other? A: It's a standard - it's called a "rack". All types of AC power cords have male connectors to allow them to attach to a metal outlet. The requirement is to be able to plug in a variety of AC adapters, depending on your needs. Basically the power supply plugs into the female connectors and a cable (the cord) is plugged into the male connectors. For some unknown reason the use of the hole in between the two connectors (what you're looking at as one connector, but is actually two connectors) is called a "rack". Having both the male connector and the female connectors in the same location is more convenient because you can always access the power cord if need be. Q: Are the Two Paths To Plantain Cooking Utensils Examined in Buddhism the same Path? Reading about the good fortune of having plantain cooking utensils does lead one to contemplate the numberless worlds, human lives, fruits and grains, the suffering of endless birth and death in samsara and the ripening of good and bad actions to result in positive or negative rebirth and the roles of arahant, aspirant, stream-enterer and so forth in this scheme of things. Being one of the most important factors in my life, I am very keen to learn about this subject and educate my friends and family who may not be well-versed on it. As such, I'd like to get some input from the Buddhist community, especially those who are more knowledgeable about this subject. Does anyone know if there is some 'canon' or '
