But forget entering your email address and password just once; consider what could happen if you left it out of your signature, or even worse, turned it off in the settings. In 2009, Google discovered that a single person using a Gmail account could control hundreds of other Gmail accounts. This allowed that person to spam or barge other people's inboxes. This week, Gmail announced that it had improved its security measures to prevent a single person from taking control of so many accounts. But, the issue is not solely Google's problem. In fact, your email address is also used to control certain applications. Just as your name is your online identity, your email address is used to log into your online life. And that means someone can log into your email account and change your password, or add new users, or run software or install apps that you didn't want. And that's only the beginning. This happened to me the other day. I don't run a lot of software on my computer, and for the most part I don't use it for work. But I log into my email account at least
