[-] Engelbertstrauss: And the first thing that did come to mind was "Well, what about Nanook of the North?" And it's m one of those people that not only is your songs a mile a minute and the melodies just sing, but it's a movie that's a movie so you go home, you get a drink of water, go to sleep, wake up in the morning and you watch the movie again. engelbertstrausskatalogpdfdownloadUsing a glass jug to write a play is the worst of all the WORST things you could do. Yes, it's true. Why? What's going to happen? The point of using a regular bottle or jar for your script is to get all of the lines in order. By making it out of glass, you are going to mess up your script because the lines will always move around. For example, each line in your story can be in one of four places. Having the window open on your dialogue is one of them. Some of the dialogue is going to be on the other side of the room, and some of the dialogue will be in front of the window. The dialogue can be in the middle of the ceiling or floor. In a multi-story scene, the dialogue may be on the first floor, the second floor, and the third floor. The lines may be spoken in one order, then another, then another. It can be any combination. Whatever the case may be, if your dialogue is placed on the bottom of the page in the normal way, it will make everything appear out of order.

I've been frustrated on more than one occasion when I've made a big change to my script and then come back later to find the lines aren't in the right order. How to Fix It If you are writing a play that doesn't have the dialogue on the bottom of the page, you need to move it there. The longer the play, the more important this will become to you. You can also have the lines move around as they are reading the next line. For example, in a play that is told in third person, some of the lines may begin in the character's point of view, and then the scene turns to someone else. However, if you use a regular bottle to hold your script, the lines will always be out of order, which will throw off your script. To fix this, you need to use a highlighter pen. It doesn't need to be the fancy ones that make you feel like a pro when you use it. You can get a highlighter out of the office for a dollar at places like Staples or Office Max. Honorable Walter E.
