However, in contrast to enteroendocrine and enteric neurons, the cells may secrete cytokines, chemokines, growth factors and neurotransmitters directly into the lumen of the intestinal tract. The movement of intestinal fluid is largely regulated by the muscularis mucosa layer, which is anatomically separated from the circular muscularis layer by an epithelial layer. The tight junctional complex between the epithelial cells forms a watertight seal which prevents fluid loss through the intestinal tract, but also prevents the translocation of bacteria and toxins from the lumen. Because the epithelial cells are directly exposed to the lumen, they may be a primary site of inflammation or infection. Pat

Project description GipsyCreole is a separate and much newer language than the other Creole languages, although it has origins in the still older Liberian Creole. It is the language spoken in The Gambia, very close to the Northeast coast of Sierra Leone, in Guinea, and more or less by all the speakers of the Creole-European languages spoken in the former Portuguese empire, i.e. in Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Cape Verde, etc. It is also spoken in Nigeria. Gipsy is roughly a subset of Bantu, and about as far from its lexicogrammatical, phonological, and morphological grammatical roots as Dutch is from English. Two or three years ago, i.e. in 2009, my interdisciplinary research group and I began a project aimed at improving the teaching of Gipsy in the Ecole Supérieure de Linguistique (ESL) at the University of Toulouse. This project is being funded by an EU grant: it will run until September 2014. The goal of this project is for GipsyCreole to be accepted as an official language of the University of Toulouse, as was already the case for European languages such as French, Spanish, German, Polish, etc. This is done through the creation of a corpus (wordlist) based on the words used in courses taught at the ES, the promotion of the language as an official language of the ES, the creation of a dictionary, and the creation of a teaching manual. The work of data collection and classification will be done on-line with the help of a local language module developed by my team. I will also have to develop other educational materials. A large part of the work that has been done is related to the development of a theoretical framework which explains the differences between Gip 648931e174

Since the 1960s, glyphosate-based herbicides have been used worldwide as a cost-effective alternative to the more traditional 2,4-D and MCPA (methyl chloro-2,4-dichlorophenoxyacetic acid) herbicides, both of which have significant environmental costs. Glyphosate is the active ingredient in the most commonly used herbicide in the United States, Roundup (Monsanto Company, St. Louis, Mo). The combination of glyphosate and Roundup has been shown to be a cost-effective alternative to the traditional herbicides for controlling weeds in annual crops and to integrated pest management. The predominant environmental impact from glyphosate is the formation of chloro-organic byproducts, particularly methyl chloro-2,4-dichlorophenoxyacetic acid (MDCPA). This paper reviews the economics of the glyphosate-
