Simultaneous EEG and bipolar extracellular multiunit recording of visual responses. In the same intact adult cats studied in part I of this paper, repetitive stimulation was applied to the caudal medial longitudinal fasciculus (CLF) and the cortical areas and subcortical nuclei responsible for its efferent projections were identified and characterized, anatomically. The goal of this study was to define the degree to which the activity of identified neurons in the CLF and cortical areas and subcortical nuclei is modulated in response to repetitive stimulation of the CLF. In addition, to evaluate the degree to which the stimulus-induced activity of the identified neurons is visually-evoked, we investigated the response of the neurons to monocular as well as binocular stimulation. These activities were investigated by simultaneous EEG and bipolar extracellular multiunit recording with the combined aid of the microelectrode technique. With this technique the spatial relationship between the active neurons and their soma could be obtained by stimulating within a small volume (1-3 mm3) of the tissue block surface which was sectioned at a very low angle (0.15-0.25 degrees). The recording waveform of a single neuron was thus obtained by conventional electrical brain mapping at the same time as the activity of the other neurons was being obtained with the microelectrode technique. The neurons were identified in the visual cortex (V1), the lateral geniculate nucleus (LGN), the pulvinar, the posterior nuclear complex and the inferior colliculus (IC). In those neurons with a clear visual response (stimulus-locked responses), the stimulation (sound and/or light) was monocular and binocular. This investigation revealed that in about half of the identified neurons (41/88), the activity of the identified neurons responded
